Worried About Swearing Too Much? Science Says You

Shouldn't Be

People who swear like a sailor are more honest and more intelligent, studies show.

Science says -- Worried me not!

If you've ever suppressed the urge to unleash a string of obscenities, maybe think again. Some research suggests that it might be a better idea to simply let the filth fly.

Scientifically speaking, a penchant for profanity doesn't seem to be such a bad thing. Studies have shown that swearing relieves stress, dulls the sensation of pain, fosters camaraderie among peers and is linked with traits like verbal fluency, openness and honesty.

WHO THE FUCK DO YOU THINK YOU ARE -- YOU ARE BEING SUCH AN ELITIST DICK!

BTW: I do not know what kind of interpersonal relationship we began and started to develop here -- MORTAL ENEMIES -- Never my intention.....

To me, I am a patient without a system -- I am flapping desperately to not drown before someone comes in to save me -- from this god awful situation -- you side on their alliance --- to drop me --- continued to be absent any kind of human decency --- to help me fix this now immediately now -- you want me to put myself in further delay death over life jeopardy -- from this day? NO NO NO NO NO NO NO NO NO SIR DOCTOR TWISTED BLUNDER -- YOU HAVE AN OBLIGATION TO FIX THIS RELATIONSHIP - PER THE AMA JOURNAL OF ETHICS - YOU ARE AT YOUR FUCKING NERVE TO BE BLIGEREANT TO A FAULT OF HOLLY COW YOUR PUBLIC IS GOING TO BECOME DISTURBED AT THE DETAILS THAT WILL BE IN YOUR FOLDER -- SIR!

Damn Honest

Beyond swearing's impacts on the body and mind, research has shown that cursing can influence our social dynamics, too. A 2012 study found that swearing can enhance the effectiveness and persuasiveness of an argument. In addition, cursing can also convey an emotional reaction to something without us resorting to physical violence.

And while many might consider swearing less than savory, a recent study revealed that people who curse often actually lie less and have a higher degree of integrity.

After the scientists surveyed how often participants use profanity, they conducted a series of tests to determine how truthful an individual was. The research team found a positive link between profanity and honesty. Cursing was associated with less deception on an interpersonal level, and higher levels of integrity overall.

May 7, 2019 - To improve America's health, the dean of Boston University School of Public Health, Sandro Galea, argues for a new framing of our public ...

Although, Galea says, health care is vital to health, he argues that the two are not interchangeable and medical care alone will not make us healthier. Instead of focusing on medicine, he's pushing for preventative measures rooted in living conditions like adequate housing and education.

Why is it important to care about the living conditions of others?

[you apparently are rejecting my concerns to blast the notions that I have no HIV Doctor]

Galea says it's because our health is "interlinked" through the systems around us. He says he sees the next step in improving America's well-being as changing the conversation, and he is optimistic.

"We're actually heading in this direction," he said.

'Well' Explores The Social And Political Underpinnings Of Health

June 4, 2019 5:01 AM ET

The typical American conversation about health focuses on personal choice as a key driver — the foods we choose to eat, the number of steps we log each day, the doctors we visit and the medicines we take. But epidemiologist Sandro Galea says that way of thinking is the wrong way.

In his new book, Well: What We Need To Talk About When We Talk About Health, the dean of Boston University School of Public Health says not only does the belief in the power of personal choice fail to fix America's health crisis, it also diverts us from real issues underlying our nation's poor health.

Social epidemiology and complex system dynamic modelling as applied to health behaviour and drug use research.

Galea S1, Hall C, Kaplan GA.

Author information

Abstract

A social epidemiologic perspective considers factors at multiple levels of influence (e.g., social networks, neighbourhoods, states) that may individually or jointly affect health and health behaviour. This provides a useful lens through which to understand the production of health behaviours in general, and drug use in particular. However, the analytic models that are commonly applied in population health sciences limit the inference we are able to draw about the determination of health behaviour by factors, likely interrelated, across levels of influence. Complex system dynamic modelling techniques may be useful in enabling the adoption of a social epidemiologic approach in health behaviour and drug use research. We provide an example of a model that aims to incorporate factors at multiple levels of influence in understanding drug dependence. We conclude with suggestions about future directions in the field and how such models may serve as virtual laboratories for policy experiments aimed at improving health behaviour.
